It all starts with a seed

Seeds are the very basis of our food system. As living organisms, each year they are re-born and flourish to feed all of humanity. Small family farmers have been the stewards of seeds for thousands of years, selecting the seeds from the best plants for the next harvest, naturally breeding seeds to create new varieties, and exchanging seeds with other farmers for greater diversity. They have developed an expertise that ensures that seeds are maximised to their full potential in the environments where they grow, and are adaptable to climate change, disease and other blights.

These traditional techniques are responsible for the wide variety of foods that exist around the world today (for instance, there are over 600 varieties of yams!), and this diversity contributes to the resilience of humankind.

Increasing corporate control of seeds, however, is diminishing the Earth's biodiversity and making it more difficult for small family farmers to have access to seeds. Already the world has lost almost 75% of crop varieties, and crop genetic diversity is vanishing at a rate of about 2% per year. In North America alone, we've lost 90% of our fruit and vegetable varieties over the past century! This means small family farmers have a shrinking choice of seed varieties available to them, which creates a less stable food supply for all of us.

The privatization of seeds and the impact on the Global South

The privatization of seeds has been occurring over several decades, and today more than 50% of the global commercial market for seeds is controlled by only three companies. These companies have been engineering genetically modified (GM) seeds that do not occur naturally in nature. These seeds are engineered to resist herbicides and pests through the addition of DNA that does not occur in plants. In addition, these seeds require fertilizers and pesticides, also produced by the companies, to grow. This can cause a farmer to incur extensive debts for using these seeds. In addition, the seeds are patented by the company, which means the farmer can't save the seeds for the following harvest and must purchase new seeds from the company each season.

Companies are given an added advantage in promoting their seeds through bilateral free-trade agreements and other international conventions (see section about UPOV '91), which encourage governments to put in place laws that make it illegal for farmers to save or use their own seeds because they are uncertified. This also contributes to the cultivation of monocultures, such as soya and corn, using GM seeds, which leads to small family farmers losing their land and to seed uniformity.

Countries in the Global South, where small family farmers provide up to 80% of the food consumed by the population, are seen as new markets for GM seeds. These seeds are being promoted as a potential solution to hunger, but many peasant and community organizations have mobilized to resist the advance of GM seeds in their countries, recognizing the threat they pose to biodiversity, to the rights of farmers and the future of food.

Farmers in Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Peru, Paraguay, Zambia, Haiti, and many other countries where DEVELOPMENT AND PEACE have partners, have mobilized to call on their governments to ban GM seeds and invest in small family farming as a more viable solution.

The trouble with UPOV '91

Plant breeding is an agricultural practice where seeds are bred with other seeds in order to create a desired change to a plant. It is a process that can take many years. Farmers have been practicing natural plant breeding for thousands of years as a way to improve their crops. In the 1960s, as seeds began to be produced by corporations, there was a call to recognize the intellectual property rights, including royalties, of professional plant breeders for the new plant varieties they created. As a result, the International Convention for the Protection of New Varieties of Plants (UPOV) was introduced. Many countries signed on to the convention. However, over time it has been updated to incorporate changes in the industry, particularly the development of GM seeds by multinational companies. The latest version, UPOV '91, places greater restrictions on farmers' rights to save, exchange and use seeds. Many countries have not ratified this version, but trade agreements are placing pressure on governments to adopt it.

Here in Canada, our seed system has been built up through the knowledge of farmers, public research and access to farmers' seeds collected from around the world. Over time, a few corporations have captured this heritage, and pushed the Canadian seed system towards GMOs and genetically uniform varieties. As such, farmers' associations and advocates have mobilized against Bill C-18, which is a law that was drafted in order to apply UPOV '91 in Canada. Introduced in Parliament in 2014, the law, if passed, will significantly reduce farmers' rights to use seeds.

What is a GMO: FROM SEED TO PLATE

Comparing the life cycle of a commercial, genetically-modified seed and that of a traditional farmer's seed.

The life cycle of a GM seed that was created by combining the DNA of different species, and is farmed on an industrialized farm.		The life cycle of a farmer's seed grown using sustainable agriculture.
A farmer buys GM corn seeds from a seed corporation.	1	A farmer sows her own corn seeds that she has stored from her last harvest.
The farmer signs a stewardship agreement with the seed corporation.	2	The farmer observes the germination, development, and flowering of the plants.
The farmer plants the seeds and applies the seed corporation's herbicide, which kills every plant that doesn't have the gene that was inserted into the seed. Only the corn survives.	3	The farmer weeds her fields, and uses natural pest control methods.
The farmer sells the crop to a large food processing company.	4	The farmer selects the best corn plants to serve as the seeds for the following crop.
The farmer must buy seeds for the next crop from the seed corporation.	5	The farmer's family eats the corn. Any surplus is sold for extra income for the family.
	6	The farmer stores the seeds, ready for the next sowing season.
